Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: ...Hill 212 and on the Montrefagne and in the edge of the large wooded area that crossed the valley east of the Montrefagne. No more challenging task could have been given troops than that of advancing for more than a kilometer along this deep draw with fire from in front and both flanks. The enemy had constructed strong shelter trenches and dugouts north of the Beauregard Farm as well as along both crests of the valley. In spite of these forbidding defenses, the men accepted their mission confidently, for in the ranks of the regiment were veterans of Cantigny and the Missy ravine and they knew how to meet and face death. With the falling of the barrage, two hundred meters in their front, the 1st Battalion, fresh and impatient, sprang forward and closed upon the line of bursting steel. Men fell fast, but on swept the successive waves. More than fifty bodies of their brave numbers were afterward counted in front of a single group of shelter trenches. Typical of their spirit, there was one, who, even in death, knelt with his rifle ready to raise, his long flaxen hair falling back from his fair forehead and his face calm in its defiance of the danger that awaited. Among the many bodies of the enemy dead at this point were those of several German officers thickly surrounded by the corpses of their men. But even a more sanguinary task awaited at the Montrefagne. A fresh enemy battalion had occupied this position during the night. From its commanding trenches it could fire directly into the approaching Americans. Up the steep ascent, through the scrubby growth and across open stretches, the line pressed forward in close liaison with the 18th Infantry on the left. Men charged and recharged, the defenders fighting with the desperation of a last stand. No longer was th...
