Excerpt from: INTO ABNORMAL CONDITIONS

The colours in the photograph have become jaded. The sky has turned from a bright gold to a burnt yellow. Even the girls have faded from a full tan to a soft mellow.

But in the photo, the weather still rages on like in a time-lapse sequence.

Excerpt from: NOT MUCH OF ANYTHING

My notebook is open. I'm ready to transcribe my daily pile of poetic poison to digital posterity. However, this time I need to ask the couch, my coach, for one last favour.

I need to keep the up familiar pattern but still be awake for my funeral. Nothing less.

Excerpt from: OUT ON THE ISLAND

Out here, at the bowling lawns and tea parties, time can disappear with a blast of the fog horn. At the Reunion Café chocolate cake is still a dollar. Behind the scene, the lights of the city begins to drift around the food and music. The dull glow penetrates the mix with an indecent howl of grandeur. All is lost.

Excerpt from: A PEACE SIGN

At 10 in the morning, she put on the same clothes that she arrived in.

"We'll, I must be going." "Why so soon? We thought we had the whole day to ..."

As she closed the door, after short hugs and kisses, she felt a tremble in their fingers. She ran across the fields where she used to play, towards the noise of the highway.
